Will you get your horse to cross the finish line first? Or does your steed need more training? Will you bet on one of the horses? Or do you decide to secretly sabotage one of the other teams?

Small teams of three or five colleagues play with and against each other, determining the perfect tactics for each race... or so they think! When the starting shot goes off, the tension mounts and the nail-biting spectators watch the race unfold on the big screen.

Will your strategy hold up for six races or will you have to make some adjustments?

As a player and team, you have to decide how and when to take actions, coordinate with your teammates and react to what the other teams are doing. This affects the outcome of the race and means that no two matches are ever the same.

At the Races takes no time to learn and is fun to play. Although everyone plays individually and chooses their own actions, the game shows time and again that teams that plan and coordinate their actions together are the most successful – and who doesn't love winning?
